Chapter 1: The Genesis of Philadelphia Murals

The origins of the Philadelphia Murals Program

The Philadelphia Murals Program was founded in 1984 by Jane Golden, a young muralist from New Jersey. Golden's vision was to use murals to beautify the city, reduce crime, and promote community pride. The program began as a small-scale initiative, but it quickly grew into one of the most successful public art programs in the country.

Golden's inspiration for the program came from her experiences in Philadelphia in the early 1980s. At the time, the city was struggling with high crime rates and a declining economy. Golden believed that murals could help to revitalize the city by making it more vibrant and attractive.

Golden began the program with a small group of volunteers. They painted their first mural on a wall in North Philadelphia. The mural, which depicted a group of children playing, was a hit with the community. Soon, other neighborhoods began to request murals.

The Philadelphia Murals Program quickly gained support from city officials and businesses. In 1987, the program received a major boost when it was awarded a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts. With this funding, the program was able to expand its reach and paint more murals throughout the city.

Today, the Philadelphia Murals Program is one of the most successful public art programs in the country. The program has painted over 2,000 murals throughout the city, and it has helped to revitalize neighborhoods, reduce crime, and improve the quality of life for residents.

Jane Golden's vision and early initiatives

Jane Golden, a young muralist from Margate, New Jersey, had a vision to use art to transform her adopted city of Philadelphia. In 1984, she founded the Philadelphia Anti-Graffiti Network, which later became the Philadelphia Murals Program. Golden's goal was to use murals to beautify the city, reduce crime, and promote community pride.

Golden's early initiatives focused on creating murals in high-crime areas. She believed that murals could help to deter crime by making neighborhoods more visually appealing and inviting. Golden also worked to involve community residents in the mural-making process, believing that this would help to create a sense of ownership and pride in the murals.

One of Golden's early successes was the "Peace Wall" mural, created in 1987 on a wall at 22nd and Ellsworth Streets in North Philadelphia. The mural, which depicts children from different races and cultures playing together, became a symbol of hope and unity in a neighborhood that had been plagued by violence.

Golden's early initiatives helped to lay the foundation for the Philadelphia Murals Program's success. Today, the program has created over 2,000 murals throughout the city, making Philadelphia one of the world's leading cities for public art.

Chapter 1: The Genesis of Philadelphia Murals

The role of community involvement

From the very beginning, the Philadelphia Murals Program has been deeply rooted in community involvement. Jane Golden, the program's founder, believed that murals should be created with and for the communities they would serve. This commitment to community involvement has been a key factor in the program's success.

One of the most important ways that the Philadelphia Murals Program involves the community is through its neighborhood-based approach. The program works with community groups and organizations to identify areas where murals would be most beneficial. Once a location has been identified, the program works with the community to develop a mural design that reflects the neighborhood's unique character and identity.

The Philadelphia Murals Program also involves the community in the creation of the murals themselves. Many of the program's murals are painted by local artists, and community members are often invited to participate in the painting process. This helps to create a sense of ownership and pride in the murals, and it ensures that the murals are truly representative of the communities they serve.

The Philadelphia Murals Program has had a profound impact on the city's communities. Murals have helped to revitalize neighborhoods, reduce crime, and improve the quality of life for residents. Murals have also helped to create a sense of community pride and identity.

Here are a few specific examples of how the Philadelphia Murals Program has involved the community in its work:

- In the early 1990s, the program worked with the community to create a series of murals in the Kensington neighborhood. The murals depicted the neighborhood's history and culture, and they helped to revitalize the area.

- In 2002, the program worked with the community to create a mural in the Powelton Village neighborhood. The mural celebrated the neighborhood's diversity and its commitment to social justice.
- In 2015, the program worked with the community to create a mural in the Strawberry Mansion neighborhood. The mural depicted the neighborhood's history and its struggles, and it helped to raise awareness of the challenges facing the community.

These are just a few examples of the many ways that the Philadelphia Murals Program has involved the community in its work. The program's commitment to community involvement has been a key factor in its success, and it has helped to create a sense of community pride and identity in Philadelphia.
