At 11:40 AM, Kennedy's motorcade left the Hotel Texas in Fort Worth, bound for Dallas Love Field. The president and his wife, Jacqueline, rode in the lead car, a sleek Lincoln Continental convertible. Governor John Connally of Texas and his wife, Nellie, were in the follow-up car.

As the motorcade made its way through the streets of Dallas, thousands of people lined the route, waving flags and cheering. The president smiled and waved back, seemingly unaware of the danger that lay ahead.

At 12:30 PM, the motorcade turned onto Elm Street, approaching Dealey Plaza. As the president's car passed the Texas School Book Depository, shots rang out. Kennedy was struck in the neck and head, and Governor Connally was also wounded.

3. The search for answers begins

In the aftermath of President Kennedy's assassination, a massive investigation was launched to find the person or persons responsible for this heinous crime. Led by J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI, the investigation left no stone unturned in its pursuit of the truth.

The FBI interviewed hundreds of witnesses, conducted countless ballistics tests, and pored over every piece of evidence related to the assassination. They followed every lead, no matter how small or insignificant it may have seemed.

Simultaneously, the Secret Service conducted its own investigation, focusing on the security breaches that allowed the assassin to get close to the president. They examined the motorcade route, the security arrangements at Dealey Plaza, and the actions of the Secret Service agents assigned to protect Kennedy.

The Warren Commission, a special presidential commission appointed by Lyndon B. Johnson, was tasked with investigating the assassination and determining whether there was a conspiracy involved. The commission conducted a thorough and exhaustive investigation, interviewing hundreds of witnesses and reviewing mountains of evidence.
