The pentagram was also revered in ancient Egypt, where it was known as the "Star of Isis" and was associated with the goddess Isis, the protector of the dead and the bringer of life.

In ancient Greece, the pentagram was known as the "Pentalpha" and was associated with the five elements: earth, air, fire, water, and spirit. It was also used as a symbol of health and protection, and was often placed above doorways and windows to ward off evil spirits.

The pentagram also appears in the Pythagorean tradition, where it was known as the "Golden Section" and was considered to be a symbol of perfect proportion and harmony.

The pentagram continued to be used as a symbol of power and protection in the Roman Empire, where it was often depicted on military standards and coins. It was also adopted by early Christians, who saw it as a symbol of the five wounds of Christ. In the Middle Ages, the pentagram was associated with both white and black magic, and was often used in magical rituals and spells. It was also used as a symbol of protection against evil, and was often found on amulets and talismans.

In the Renaissance, the pentagram experienced a renewed interest, particularly among scholars and artists. It was during this time that the pentagram was first associated with the concept of the microcosm and the macrocosm, the idea that the human body is a
