Chapter 1: The Grisly Discovery

The gruesome discovery in the icebox

The elderly couple, Fred and Edwina Rogers, were pillars of their Houston community. They were well-respected and loved by their friends and neighbors. However, on a sweltering Father's Day, the unthinkable happened - they were found brutally murdered in their own home.

The gruesome discovery was made by their next-door neighbor, Helen Wilson, who had become concerned when she hadn't seen the couple in several days. Upon entering their home, she was met with a horrific sight. The Rogerses lay dead in the kitchen, their bodies concealed within the icy depths of their refrigerator.

The police were called immediately, and the investigation began. The scene was gruesome, and the detectives were baffled by the lack of any apparent motive. The Rogerses were retired and had no known enemies. They were also financially secure, so robbery was ruled out.

As the investigation progressed, the detectives began to piece together the puzzle. They discovered that the Rogerses had been killed on Father's Day, but their bodies were not found until several days later. This meant that the killer had had ample time to clean up the crime scene and cover their tracks.

The detectives also discovered that the Rogerses had been hosting a small gathering on the day of their murder. The guest list included their close friends, their children, and their grandchildren. The detectives interviewed each of the guests, but none of them could provide any information that could lead to the killer.

The case of the murdered Rogerses quickly became one of the most baffling in Houston's history. The detectives worked tirelessly, but they were unable to find any leads. The case went cold, and the killer remained at large.

Detective William Murdoch and his partner, Constable George Crabtree, were the first to arrive at the scene. The house was eerily silent, the only sound the buzzing of flies in the summer heat. As they stepped inside, they were met with a scene of unspeakable horror.

The living room was in disarray, furniture overturned and bloodstains splattered on the floor. The bodies of the elderly couple were found in the kitchen, their throats slashed and their bodies concealed within the icy depths of their refrigerator.

The detectives began their investigation, meticulously documenting the crime scene and searching for any clues that could lead them to the killer. They interviewed the neighbors, but no one had seen or heard anything suspicious. The victims were well-liked and respected members of the community, and their brutal murder seemed senseless.

As the investigation progressed, the detectives hit a dead end. There were no witnesses, no apparent motive, and no suspects. The case grew cold, and the Rogers' murders remained unsolved.
