One significant hurdle was the lack of financial resources. With limited capital, Hershey struggled to acquire the necessary equipment and ingredients to produce chocolate on a large scale. He often relied on loans and partnerships to keep his business afloat.

Another challenge was the competitive landscape. The chocolate industry was already saturated with established players, making it difficult for a newcomer like Hershey to gain a foothold. Hershey's products had to stand out in terms of quality and taste to capture the attention of consumers.

Furthermore, Hershey faced skepticism and resistance from potential customers. Chocolate was still a relatively new and unfamiliar treat in the United States, and many people were hesitant to try it.
