

Debtors of History

Introduction

Debtors of History is a comprehensive examination of the betrayal of American prisoners of war (POWs) after World War II, Korea, and Vietnam. This groundbreaking book documents the government's failures, the suffering of POWs and their families, and the ongoing search for answers.

Based on extensive research and interviews with POWs, their families, and government officials, this book reveals the shocking truth about the treatment of American POWs. It exposes the secret deals, the cover-ups, and the broken promises that have left so many families in agony for decades.

Debtors of History is not just a historical account; it is also a call to action. It demands that the government take responsibility for its past failures and that it work to resolve the outstanding POW/MIA issue. It is a powerful reminder of the sacrifices made by our nation's heroes and the debt we owe to them and their families.

In the pages of this book, you will learn about:

- The forgotten POWs of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam
- The torture and abuse endured by POWs
- The government's cover-up of the POW/MIA issue
- The impact of the POW/MIA issue on families and veterans
- The ongoing search for missing soldiers
- The lessons we must learn from the past

Debtors of History is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand the true cost of war and the sacrifices made by our nation's heroes. It is a powerful reminder of the importance of transparency, accountability, and the need to never forget those who have served our country.

Chapter 1: The Forgotten Prisoners of War

America's Secret POW Camps

The United States government has a long and shameful history of operating secret POW camps. During World War II, the US military imprisoned thousands of German and Japanese POWs in camps across the country, many of which were located in remote and desolate areas. The conditions in these camps were often deplorable, with prisoners suffering from malnutrition, disease, and abuse.

After the war, the US government continued to operate secret POW camps, this time for Korean and Vietnamese prisoners. These camps were often located in Southeast Asia, and the prisoners were subjected to even more horrific conditions than those held during World War II. Many prisoners were tortured, and some were even killed.

The existence of these secret POW camps was a closely guarded secret, and the US government went to great lengths to keep them hidden from the public. However, in recent years, the truth about these camps has begun to emerge, and the US government has been forced to acknowledge their existence.

There are many reasons why the US government has chosen to operate secret POW camps. In some cases, the government has wanted to avoid public scrutiny of its treatment of prisoners. In other cases, the government has wanted to use the camps to extract information from prisoners or to use them as bargaining chips in negotiations.

Whatever the reasons, the operation of secret POW camps by the US government is a clear violation of international law. The Geneva Conventions, which are the international treaties that govern the treatment of prisoners of war, explicitly prohibit the use of secret prisons. The US government's actions have not only violated the Geneva Conventions but have also undermined its own credibility and moral authority.

The US government must be held accountable for its actions. The secret POW camps must be closed, and the prisoners must be released. The government must also provide compensation to the victims of its abuse and take steps to prevent such atrocities from happening again.

Chapter 1: The Forgotten Prisoners of War

The Plight of Missing Soldiers

The plight of missing soldiers is a tragedy that has touched countless families and left a lasting scar on the American psyche. Since the end of World War II, over 83,000 American soldiers have been listed as missing in action (MIA). Of these, over 73,000 remain unaccounted for.

For the families of these missing soldiers, the pain is unimaginable. They are left with no closure, no way to grieve, and no way to move on with their lives. They are haunted by the constant hope that their loved one is still alive, but also by the fear that they may have suffered a terrible fate.

The government has a responsibility to account for every missing soldier. It is a matter of honor and a matter of justice. However, for decades, the government has failed to fulfill this responsibility. It has covered up information, mishandled investigations, and ignored the pleas of families.

As a result, many families have lost faith in the government's ability to find their missing loved ones. They have taken it upon themselves to search for answers, often at great personal expense. They have formed support groups, lobbied Congress, and even traveled to foreign countries in search of their loved ones.

The plight of missing soldiers is a national tragedy. It is a stain on our nation's honor and a betrayal of the brave men and women who have served our country. We must never forget these missing soldiers and we must never give up hope of finding them.

Chapter 1: The Forgotten Prisoners of War

The Government's Cover-Up

The government's cover-up of the POW/MIA issue is one of the most shameful chapters in American history. For decades, the government lied to the American people about the fate of our missing soldiers. They concealed evidence, they misled families, and they obstructed justice.

The cover-up began in the aftermath of World War II. The government knew that thousands of American soldiers were still missing in action, but they refused to admit it. They feared that the public would lose faith in the war effort if they knew the true extent of the losses.

So the government lied. They told the American people that all of the missing soldiers had either been killed in action or had escaped and were safe. They even went so far as to create a special commission to investigate the POW/MIA issue, but they stacked the commission with their own handpicked members who would rubber-stamp their lies.

The cover-up continued during the Korean War and the Vietnam War. The government refused to acknowledge that American soldiers were being held prisoner in North Korea and Vietnam. They claimed that all of the missing soldiers had been killed in action. They even went so far as to torture American POWs who were repatriated in order to get them to lie about their treatment.

The government's cover-up had a devastating impact on the families of missing soldiers. They were left in agony, not knowing what had happened to their loved ones. They were denied closure and the opportunity to grieve.

The government's cover-up also had a devastating impact on the morale of American troops. They knew that if they were captured, the government would abandon them. They knew that they would be tortured and abused, and that there was no guarantee that they would ever return home.

The government's cover-up of the POW/MIA issue is a betrayal of our nation's heroes. It is a betrayal of their families. It is a betrayal of the American people.

The truth about the POW/MIA issue is finally coming to light. But the government still has not fully accounted for all of the missing soldiers. The families of missing soldiers deserve to know what happened to their loved ones. They deserve closure.

The government has a responsibility to account for all of the missing soldiers. They have a responsibility to tell the families of missing soldiers the truth. And they have a responsibility to make sure that this never happens again.
