The king was initially resistant, unaccustomed to such candid and unvarnished truths. However, Al-Hakim's unwavering persistence and heartfelt pleas eventually began to soften the king's resolve.

Together, the king and Al-Hakim embarked on a journey across the kingdom, venturing into villages and towns, witnessing firsthand the hardships and struggles of their subjects. The king was deeply moved by the resilience and unwavering spirit of his people. He realized that true happiness lay not in acquiring more wealth but in alleviating the suffering of others.
